Norway rats, black rats, Gambian rats, and kiore are all lumped together for most of the book, even though the animals are very different. The author also missed many wonderful opportunities. For example, on page 20, he discusses rats as pests in the White House, and Teddy Roosevelt leading rat hunts in the dining room.

We do not know when the first rat scurried aboard a ship. Most likely, it happened about 3,000 years ago, when our distant ancestors first built and sailed ships. Being fast learners, rats found that life was good aboard ship. The dark, damp storage areas belowdecks held everything they needed for a healthy, ratty existence. They drank from the barrels of fresh water kept for the crew. They feasted on sacks of grain and other foods meant for the crew and for sale in distant markets.
