Adopting a process view of organizations (Tsoukas and Chia, 2002), what kind of process is the organizing process? This chapter begins by arguing that the organizing process is an inherently narrative abductive inquiry. Taking a praxeological (purposeful activity-focused) rather than discursive (language and discourse-focused) view of narrativity, it concentrates on the narrativity of ...

This discourse is the result of a complex verbal task (Levelt, 1989). The complex verbal task (description in this research) refers to a communicative context which demands the speaker to use complex means of linearization and organization of information. To produce a discourse, a speaker needs two types of knowledge: 1.
