A 19th century who-dunnit complete with beautiful but cunning villainess, rambling old houses and an upper-class layabout-turned-detective. Fabulous! This was one of the first "sensation" novels ever written, and while it doesn't have the sophisticated and multi-layered plots of today that keep us guessing until the very end and on the edge of our seats, it is nonetheless a great page turner and so much fun.

Janice Radway's great book on twentieth-century romance novels, Reading the Romance, has an almost sociological argument about romance readers. Her assessment of the heroine of a romance novel counters the Victorian angel in the house: the romance novel heroine is always dark, with flashing eyes, very independent, does things for herself.

Set in the late Victorian period it stars Alan Dobie as Cribb, a Scotland Yard Detective Sargeant. The tone of the series is set by Cribb's character - from humble origins he has to suffer fools (his snobbish and social-climbing superior for one) whose connections have brought advancement, if not gladly then with wry and tongue in cheek humour.

Nocturne for a Widow began as my idea of what might happen to Shakespeare's bickering lovers Beatrice and Benedick if they were stuck together in a haunted house. I already had the perfect heroine: spirited actress Sybil Ingram, whom I originally invented for a minor role in a more serious gothic romance, With This Curse. Readers who enjoy confident heroines, romantic banter, and a little bit ...
