Adjustment policies have run for more than a decade, with considerable initial success. Ghana's SAP was the first in Africa to formally integrate a 'Programme of Actions to Mitigate the Social Costs of Adjustment' (PAMSCAD). Recently, however, the strategy has shown signs of faltering and imbalances are re-emerging.

“Lessons from Africa for Greece” Greece, like many African countries, is simply facing structural adjustment. By the 1990s, most African countries were under structural adjustment superimposed upon them by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank.

What can Africa learn from the Greek crisis?

The IMF has certainly learned some lessons from its mistakes. However, there are alternatives to its policies. Both civil-society organisations and multilateral institutions like the ILO (International Labour Organization) or the UN Economic Commission for Africa, have suggested other approaches.
