Ancient Greek Art - Facts, Architecture & Projects - HISTORY

Ancient Greek architecture is distinguished by its highly formalised characteristics, both of structure and decoration. This is particularly so in the case of temples where each building appears to have been conceived as a sculptural entity within the landscape, most often raised on high ground so that the elegance of its proportions and the effects of light on its surfaces might be viewed from all angles. [2]

Introduction to Greek architecture (article) | Khan Academy

(Page 83, Greek Architecture and Its Sculptures, Jenkins, I) Greek architecture was heavily slanted towards the rules. The columns had to be specific heights and widths apart while the building needed a set ratio. This means the artistry of Greek architecture comes from the sculpture and art decorations rather than the structure itself.
